Carlos is twenty-five years old and works as a professional tour guide in Madrid. However, he doesn't have a traditional office job. Instead of sitting at a desk, the historic streets of the city are his workplace. He designs customized itineraries for international tourists, which means he must speak both English and Spanish fluently every single day.

Because his job is physically demanding, Carlos's morning routine is strictly organized. He wakes up at 6:30 AM, eats a heavy breakfast for energy, and packs his equipment. He always carries a large, heavy backpack. Inside, he has a tablet to show tourists old historical photographs, a portable phone charger, and a small first-aid kit just in case someone gets a blister from walking. Although he is a guide, he doesn't have a map in his bag; he knows the city entirely by heart.

Today is particularly busy because Carlos is guiding a large group of thirty students from Canada. Right now, they are walking through the famous Retiro Park. Usually, Carlos enjoys talking with his groups, but today he is struggling a little bit because the students are talking very quickly and using a lot of modern slang.

After he finishes his tours at 5:00 PM, Carlos is usually exhausted, but his day isn't over. He doesn't go straight home to relax. Instead, he takes the subway to a language academy where he is currently taking advanced French classes. He doesn't have a lot of free time, but he is studying hard because he hopes to expand his tour business to Paris next year.
